Why do you need a studio?

As a photographer, the world is your studio, but after a while you may get tired of having to juggle with the sun and weather. That's when you know it's time to work in an area where you can control the environment. And finish the job on time, with a more refined look.

For the more casual photographer, using a studio is the best way to learn how to work with and control your lighting and subject. And of course, our talented and well-versed professional trainer is at your disposal if required.

You will be able to control the environment to a much greater degree than if you were outside. Waiting for clouds to move, the wind to die down or for passers-by to clear your frame can be an annoyance that you will not have to deal with when working in our Studio. You can utilise the large windows for natural light shoots, or artificial lighting for a more specialised style.

A studio environment also means that you have easy access to amenities such as air conditioning, food, water, restrooms, makeup and so on. And it's completely private and secure with plenty of free off-street parking.

Fees are quite moderate and allow you to access superb equipment for no capital outlay.
